The free flow of data is essential to an ever-growing segment of the global economy. Yet some policymakers and advocates, citing privacy concerns, have called for shutting off the faucet and restricting data flow, to the detriment of European consumers and European businesses, both small and large.

With cooler heads and a laser-like focus on the best interests of all European citizens, the European Commission and the US Department of Commerce have been tirelessly working to build a better framework for maintaining a seamless flow of data across the Atlantic in a manner that respects the privacy of European citizens.
